Twenty blinds is deep enough that shoving is no longer standard, and that changes everything about how you should call. A player who jams 20bb is either following a jam-or-fold chart correctly — in which case they have a strong range — or they are making a mistake by removing all their own post-flop equity. Against the first player you need the range below; against the second, you can call a little wider, but only if you are sure.

The calling range has narrowed to the hands that beat a real range in a raw showdown: medium and big pairs, AJ+, and KQ. The small pairs are gone. They were never good against strong hands — they were good against the wide, bluff-heavy shoves you get at 10bb, and those shoves do not exist here.

The counterintuitive part is that you fold more as your equity in the pot grows. That is correct: the dead money (your 1bb blind) is a constant, but the amount you must risk to claim it has doubled. Price, not hand strength, is what moved.
